>sk galatea about herself
That's not a verb I recognize.

>ask galatea about herself
"Read the placard," she says. "That's what it's there for, after all."

>read placard
Large cream letters on a black ground.

47. Galatea

White Thasos marble. Non-commissioned work by the late Pygmalion of Cyprus. (The artist has since committed suicid Originally not an animate. The waking of this piece from its natural state remains unexplained.

>ask galatea about pygmalion
A pause. "I don't know where he is," she says. "Or who, or what, for that matter. He sold me immediately after my waki carving me, there was no strangeness, but afterward..."

>ask galatea about the waking (the experience of waking)
"What was it like, waking up?" you ask.

She turns -- not her whole body, just her head, so that you can see one ear behind the cascade of hair. "It was night. I had see, for a long time -- it was the talking, or the pain of being carved, that made me aware, I think.

"But one night-- he slept in a corner of the studio-- I heard him screaming in his sleep. More loudly than usual. And I for move, and I just stepped down and woke him."

She gains confidence as you do not interrupt. "At the time he seemed glad to have me there, to listen to him -- though I th was only another dream. It was only afterward that it became strange."

>sk galatea about being sold
That's not a verb I recognize.

>ask galatea about being sold
You can't form your question into words.

Her head moves -- as though she were going to turn and look at you properly -- but then she thinks better of it. "He didn't you see. He didn't make me to be a live person. He told me he wanted something that belonged to him, and that if I coul couldn't belong to him any more. So he threw me away."

(It's all in the delivery; hers is not bad. Too bad about the artist.)

`