On the pedestal is Galatea.

>ask galatea about her dress
She shrugs in it. "It looks odd, doesn't it?" she says. "I insisted on clothes, and they bought me this."

>ask galatea about her owners
"What are your owners like?"

"Aren't they out there in the other room?" she asks, surprised. "That's where they said they were going to be."

"Yes, of course," you say quickly. A pause. "I was wondering about your impressions of them. Obvously you must have than I could."

She shrugs. "I know too little about people to come to any kind of conclusion. And they don't talk to me much. No one c >ask galatea about being awake

You can't form your question into words.

>ask galatea about art
"What do you know about art?"

"In the abstract?" You become aware of her breathing -- the slight expansion of her ribs, the soft exhalation -- natural, and "Not much. I've seen very few pieces: myself, and the murals at the airport -- and the latter, I am led to believe, do not qu

>ask galatea about her name
You can't form your question into words.

"He used to talk about his Muses," she says, evidently following on her own train of thought. "I didn't know for the longe talking about. In fact, I still don't really understand. I never saw them; if they were in the studio with us, they never show

>ask galatea about the muses
"What did he tell you about the Muses?" (An artist's idea of his own inspiration is usually fascinating though sadly incon

"He said that they were the only gods who had not deserted him entirely. He told me that they gave him the means to face madness -- and though I sometimes wondered what that meant, I'm glad he felt so."

>ask galatea about his death
Her head moves -- as though she were going to turn and look at you properly -- but then she thinks better of it. "Mine? O

Before you can answer, she lifts one shoulder in a delicate shrug. "It doesn't matter which you mean, since I know nothing will go your way when the time comes; and I-- Who can die who is not alive?"

>ask galatea about the opening
You can't form your question into words.

`